A aircraft of passengers C919 operated by China Southern Airlines made the first commercial flight of the airline with headquarters in Guangzhou. The aircraft C919 received a ceremonial water salute upon arrival at Lhasa Gonggar International Airport, in the Tibet Autonomous Region, southwest of China, on September 19, 2024.

The Chinese C919, developed by Commercial Aircraft Corporation of China (COMAC), completed a flight from the province of Sichuan, southwest of China, to the neighboring Tibet Autonomous Region on Friday (19), marking the first landing of the aircraft in Xizang.

Lhasa Gonggar International Airport is located in the Yarlung Zangbo River Valley, at an altitude of 3,569 meters. With steep mountains and a variable meteorological environment, the local conditions impose high demands on the operational performance of the aircraft at high altitude.

The C919 aircraft will now conduct test flights and development for key systems, such as environmental control, avionics and propulsion, which are essential for high-altitude operations. In addition, verifications of adaptability for high-altitude airports will be carried out. This will establish the basis for meeting the operational needs of high-altitude routes and the development of variants of high-altitude aircraft in the future, said COMAC.

Aircraft that operate at altitudes above 2,438 meters above sea level are called high-altitude airports, according to specialists in the sector.
